

After a recent car purchase had gone through, the new owner parked his gleaming new vehicle outside his house. He was supplied with a car cover and when he was about to retire for the night, put the cover on the car.

Just before retiring he noticed someone taking a closer look at the front of the car. As he opened the door the person took off. The lad seemed to be checking whether the vehicle had red plates (dealer plates) or not.

The following day at the dealership our buyer was told that there was quite the possibility that someone was planning to steal the vehicle as the red plates means the car is not yet registered and can command a higher price if stolen.

This was something the dealership might have pointed out prior to selling the non-alarmed vehicle our purchaser thought.

He quickly went off and purchased a gearbox lock and a brake lock as these didn't take as long as an alarm system to fit.

He slept a little more comfortably that night knowing that any potential thief would have to make a bit of noise if they wanted to take the car.

The next morning he woke up and was about to go for a drive when he couldn't find his keys anywhere.

He searched high and lo until he finally remembered where he had left them.

The keys for the house, car, brake lock and gearbox lock were sitting nice and neatly in the car in the centre console for all to see.
